While the Democrats are scratching out each other's eyes, the Republicans bob up serenely and are working hard to pull their entire ticket through, with nine chances out of ten of doing so. It is pretty generally conceded that the Republicans have nominated a remarkably fine ticket, and the Democrats have been trembling in their boots when they thought of facing the inevitable results. Considered from any stand-point the Democratic ticket is weak, and it will not be surprising at all if the Republicans have many more workers of the Heney stripe before the campaign is closed.
